On these solemn occasions, they latake themselves to some solitary place—perhaps at the outskirts of a wood; and the whole community gather and vociferate around the offender, reproaching him, no doubt, with his baseness. What punishment follows we are unable to tell; for this secret tribunal has its spies and sentinels posted around, and on the slightest alarm the court breaks up, and changes the venue to some more solitary spot. The very mystery of the proceedings, however, is ominous of some terrible catastrophe; and we turn away with a shudder from speculating on the doom of the guilty sparrow.

The sparrows, besides, are obstinate and deter-mined to the last degree; they think nothing of repulse, but return again and again to their attempt, of whatever nature it may be. They have a Zouavian boldness and impudence; they hold in utter contempt the laws of property; and, in fact, they have every characteristic of reckless banditti or roving bucaneers. It is not wonderful that a body of this nature should become formidable by more than numbers, even to more powerful and agile creatures. In spite of the gallant sorties of the garrison-in spite of the lightning sweeps among the enemy-the nests were sometimes reached and received considerable damage; and although the besiegers were always driven back, they were always sure to return.
